ORDER

Subject: Change in the name of National Institute of Communicable Diseases (NICD) as 'National Centre for Disease Control (NCDC)'

National Institute of Communicable Diseases had its origin as Central Malaria Bureau at Kasauli, Himachal Pradesh in 1909 and was renamed in 1927 as the Malaria Survey of India. It was shifted to Delhi in 1938 and was renamed as the Malaria Institute of India. With the drastic reduction of Malaria incidence during 1960s, the activities of the institute were expanded to cover other communicable diseases and the Institute got its present name i.e. National Institute of Communicable Diseases in July 1963.

With the rapidly changing epidemiological scenario, and ever looming threat of emerging and re-emerging infectious diseases, it is felt necessary to further enlarge the scope of tasks performed by NICD. It has, therefore, been decided with the approval of Competent Authority to up-grade the National Institute of Communicable Diseases and to rename it as 'National Centre for Disease Control (NCDC)' with effect from July 30, 2009.

The new name of the Institute as National Centre for Disease Control (NCDC) will be used in future for all purposes. The changed nomenclature may be given wide publicity.
